Sprenger + Lang, PLLC, a boutique litigation firm best known for representing employees in major class action discrimination cases, announced today that it has closed its Minneapolis office. Over the years the firm has successfully taken on numerous large Minnesota-based employers including C.H. Robinson, 3M, the University of Minnesota, Cargill, and Burlington Northern. One of the firm's cases, Jenson v. Eveleth Mines, is believed to be the first sexual harassment class action in the country and inspired the recent Warner Bros. feature film North Country. Sprenger + Lang's managing partner, Steve Sprenger, said that several of the firm's Minnesota attorneys will remain associated with the firm. He added that the firm would begin the process of hiring attorneys and support staff in its main office in Washington, DC to assist in prosecuting the firm's portfolio of employment and consumer class actions. In addition, the firm has named Eden Brown Gaines a partner in its Washington office; Ms. Gaines will head up Sprenger + Lang's new government and commercial practice, which will serve businesses of all sizes, including minority and women-owned government contractors.
